Reinventing Parking in Honolulu

Like many municipalities, Honolulu has parking ordinances that are decades old, outdated, and continue to constrain us into the future. Lawmakers are asking critical questions about whether these ordinances are still serving the best interests of the communities of today - or whether they actually impede our ability to meet communities’ climate and environmental goals, hinder progress on housing affordability, and limit access to upward mobility for the next generation.

For example, Honolulu’s land use ordinances require that new buildings must include multiple parking spaces for every home and business they contain. But Millennials and their younger Generation Z counterparts have very different practices and patterns around car ownership than prior generations. The trend is toward less reliance on single-occupancy vehicles, partly because it reduces car emissions and fossil fuel dependence, but also because of the viability of less costly, more efficient modes of transportation, ranging from rideshare and public transit, to biking and walking.

Many younger families simply do not see the need for every adult member of their household to own a car, especially if that means they have to pay extra for what is essentially parking storage at their home or workplace - or both. Older adult households

Over decades, parking minimum requirements have resulted in overbuilt parking taking up more valuable space than is needed, consuming land and resources, and undermining efforts to create more walkable, bikeable and sustainable communities. It's also important to note that the COVID-19 pandemic has highlighted the role of the built environment to facilitating social distancing, active living, and even access to food given the increased need to accommodate a variety of delivery services.

Sadly, one of the most unfortunate side effects of our current parking policies is the contribution to higher housing costs for local families. According to Reinventing Parking, parking requirements in residential buildings are estimated to add $225 per parking spot every month to housing costs. In some expensive areas, that number could easily be $350 per month, adding up to thousands of dollars per year for a two-spot unit. This remains true as many residents shoulder that cost even without using the spaces.

The same types of burdens are placed on businesses, where the parking requirements ensure that those operations often have to provide more space for parking than for actual revenue-generating space. Video illustrations of the high cost of free parking are available here.

What can you do about it?

* Tell your story. Have parking requirements helped or hindered your business operations, especially in light of COVID-19? Share your experience with Kathleen Rooney, director of transportation policy and programs at the Ulupono Initiative, at krooney@ulupono.com or (808) 544-8966.

* Help support Bill 2 (2020), which updates Honolulu's parking requirements, and let lawmakers know you support communities' affordable housing and climate goals and a market-based approach to help rightsize parking. Contact your City Council member at: www.honolulu.gov/council.

Get Back on the Wave Now

O'ahu businesses are invited to join the "Back on the Wave" campaign and receive a one time box of no-cost PPE and signage.

"Back on the Wave" is a campaign highlighting how O'ahu's businesses are keeping their staff and guests safe. It's a free service provided by the City and County of Honolulu to support local companies and our island's economic recovery.

Why should you get Back on the Wave?

Every business that participates will receive a no-cost personal protective equipment (PPE) bundle for their location and Back on the Wave signage to display.

The site will be supported with a consumer outreach campaign that includes news releases, digital advertising, and social media marketing.

Don't miss this opportunity to include your business on the site's directory that people will use to look up local businesses with safe practices.
